stuck with writers block, returns to his roots to write an old-fashioned love story. One day at the stroke of noon, Abhimanyu, a Delhi-based adman, arrived in Dhaka to hand over his business. He was greeted with a warm "Acha" from his elder brother, Mitu, who was a techie in his early 20s. His parents, Sanjay and Sushma, welcomed him and were overjoyed to meet their youngest sibling after so long. Their family was not without its dramas: Sanjay was killed in a road accident while driving home from the office. Sushma was born blind and spent her childhood in a state of trauma. But Abhimanyu was the eldest, and the family saw him as the one who could give them solace in their hours of need. Thus, Abhi decided to make his home in Dhaka. He looked up his brother, but to his shock Mitu was in tears, having met a woman, Preeti, at the restaurant on the pavement outside his flat. Mitu could not forget the sight of her pretty smile. "A real deal", he thought. In no time they hit it off, and for the next few weeks Mitu left his job and began working for Preeti as a chauffeur. Mitu would take Preeti to the cinema and dinner and most evenings would return home late to write in a study. Mitu had always dreamed of becoming a novelist, and he was about to fulfil that dream. His income, however, was quite low, and he was often in need of money. Thus, he asked Abhi to help him out with some financial assistance. Abhi, who could never refuse his brother's pleas, went to the jewellery store he owned in Delhi to ask for help in depositing some money that was being held in a Swiss bank. There, Abhi met Aisha Ali, the charming owner of the store, and, despite his shock, he fell in love with her and decided to help her husband, Ibrahim Ali. Later, he found out that his brother Mitu's brain was malfunctioning and that he was in need of a neurologist. His brother told him that since a few months ago he had begun having abnormal dreams and feared that his health was slowly deteriorating. Thus, he wanted Abhi to take him to a neurologist. Abhi agreed to get his brother checked up, and the next day, Mitu boarded a flight
